The signal event which gave birth to mediæval illumination, or rather to the ideas which were thereby concentrated upon the production of magnificent books, was the rebuilding of the Imperial Palace and the Basilica of Constantine, henceforward to be known as the Church of Sancta Sophia, or the Divine Wisdom, at Byzantium. The Emperor Justinian had been reigning six years when a terrific fire, caused by the conflicts between the various seditions, called Circus factions, of the time, almost ...

Byzantine book illumination was at its most ambitious and innovative in the decorated psalters produced between the 9th and 11th centuries. Here, Kalliroe Linardou explains the two main types of illuminated psalters and describes some of their key features. A psalter is essentially the Book of Psalms, a book of the Old Testament that during the Middle Ages was accessible in two main formats: either as part of a complete bible or as an independent volume.

The opulence of Constantine's cosmopolitan court may have had a direct impact on Byzantine manuscripts (6th-15th centuries). Just like the emperor's regal ceremonies in this glorious new heart of Europe, illuminated manuscripts of the time are sumptuous; they reveal lavish use of gold and other precious metals, bright, vibrant colors and empty spaces often filled with gold leaf in an endeavor to make figures as natural-looking as possible.
