Nationalism and Foreign Policy | Oxford Research Encyclopedia of Politics

The contributors to this book draw on their recent research to show that the relationship between foreign policy events and public opinion is at the heart of understanding Russian nationalism. In particular, the book examines the key role played by the annual national celebration of Victory Day in shaping public attitudes to foreign policy. It also analyses the impact of major foreign policy events, such as the 2008 war with Georgia, on public opinion.

The contributors argue that a new Russian nationalism is emerging that has consequences for the future of the country. They show that Russian nationalism is not just a reaction to the perceived threats posed by foreign policy events, but also a strategic tool used to shape public opinion in support of the government's foreign policy objectives. The book also considers the role of the state in promoting nationalism, particularly through the media and education, and examines the impact of international relations on the development of Russian nationalism.
